High-speed Internet also called broadband is a digital signal used on most telephone lines that allows higher bit rates than conventional (e.g. 3G, 4G, or '4.5G') Internet connections. The World Bank considers high-speed Internet to be a necessity in modern society. The United Nations has estimated that by the year 2020, about three-fourths of the world's population will have access to it. In the developing world, where the demand for Internet is highest, it is often provided by the government in partnership with telecommunications companies. In the developed world, it is often provided by private companies and is commonly available. Areas that lack high-speed Internet have been identified as "super-dense" or "ultra-dense" net villages.
